

YWCA candlelight vigil marks domestic violence

Meeting at city's YWCA seeks to raise awareness of the problem.

October 19, 2013 | By Connie K. Ho

Attendees share a moment of silence during the annual... (Roger Wilson / Times...)

Candles lined the stage, lighting life-sized cutouts of a mother and child.

The darkened room at the YWCA in Glendale flickered with dozens of candles, quiet for a moment of silence as people lowered their heads as part of a vigil Thursday night to raise awareness of domestic violence.

The event, hosted by the city's Commission on the Status of Women and the YWCA, coincides with October being Domestic Violence Awareness Month.

"This is an important event; we all understand the issue and it's a major issue. It has nothing to do with culture or income or age or anything else," said Glendale City Councilman Frank Quintero. "We're going to work and we're going to minimize it every year."

A number of community groups were present at the event, including the Armenian Relief Society and Soroptimist International.

"I am happy to see that organizations are collaborating together to empower, to inspire, to prevent and to educate community members more and more, each and every year," said ARS Chairwoman Lena Bozoyan.

Advertisement

FIND MORE STORIES ABOUT

- Ywca
- Domestic Violence
- Candlelight Vigil

FEATURED ARTICLES

Community: Glendale YWCA clients given short finance course
August 20, 2013

Community: YWCA thanks Las Candelas
April 29, 2014

An abuse survivor tells her story
October 19, 2012

Watch Live Now

powered by SafeBrowser

Breaking News

Watch Now

The presentation included a performance by the Jayvee Dance Center, whose dancers moved to the song "To Build a Home," and a reading of a poem in Armenian, Spanish and English.

"To have the dancers be a part of it and add that wonderful artistic element — that was so compelling," said Lisa Raggio, director of development at the YWCA.

The YWCA focuses on helping families fleeing from domestic violence and connects them with various resources. The program currently serves around 140 clients, many of whom reside in Glendale and Burbank, say officials.

"We are slowly but surely creating a space where those individuals who are being served feel safe, supported and empowered," said Karyna Gonzalez, who works with those clients at the non-profit.

"It is our hope to continue to provide opportunities for self-discovery, independence and opportunity and skills to live a life free from violence," she added.

Clients are assigned case managers, given the opportunity to enroll in classes on themes such as domestic violence education and emotional management, and offered counseling and legal services.

"I learned to open up. I learned to share emotions, which has always been difficult for me, and also to be OK accepting help or learning to ask for help," said Joanne Meraz, a graduate of the program, in a phone interview on Friday.

Meraz, 40, currently residing in Pasadena and working at a university, visited the YWCA in 2011 and enrolled in the program shortly after.

"As a female in an abusive relationship, you tend to shut down and you become afraid and doubtful of yourself and everything around you," she said. "Without institutions like the YWCA, there's no doubt that it would make it difficult, almost nearly impossible, to walk away from such a negative part in our life."

Connie K. Ho is a freelance writer.

From the Web

Sponsored Links by Taboola

It's Like eBay, But Everything Sells in 90 Seconds.

Tophatter

Two Banks That Pay 10 Times The Interest On Your Savings

MyFinance Bank Referrals

Play this for 1 minute and see why everyone is addicted

Throne: Free Online Game

Constant Fatigue Is A Warning Sign – See The Simple Fix

Gundry MD

Before You Join Home Chef, Watch This

Home Chef

My Husband and I Tried Blue Apron, Here's What Happened

Blue Apron

Presenting The 10 Best Luxury Cars Under $35,000

Kelley Blue Book

Surprising Truth Behind Life Insurance

PolicyGenius